For most children, the scrapes and bruises of childhood heal quickly, leaving only the occasional scar and some good stories about the adventures behind any lasting marks.

But for others, the story is different. In Canada each year, thousands of children are harmed by family members, caregivers, neighbours, and strangers. Child abuse can leave emotional scars that last a lifetime, long after bones have knit and cuts have healed.

As a clinical psychologist, as well as mother and grandmother, Elizabeth (BE) knows what it takes to raise a healthy, happy child—and what happens when a child's needs aren't met and a relationship of trust is broken.

It's her job to help repair the damage, and to prepare the next generation of psychologists to do the same. "I feel so gifted that I'm able to be a professor and work with young people," says DeLuca, who teaches psychology at the University of Manitoba. "But
